Amazon Prime Free for 30 Days. Ties that Bind Ties that Bind is the only solo studio album by Matthew Sweet, released in 1984 by Warner Bros. Records. It is not to be confused with the Ties That Bind (Giorgio Moroder album) of 1983. This was Matthew Sweet's first solo studio album as well as his first on Warner Bros. Records. It was recorded in July 1982 in sessions produced by Giorgio Moroder. The album is composed of down-tempo rock songs, influenced by Sweet's work with his band The Belmonts and his work with Giorgio Moroder. The first side of the LP features nine original songs, with "I Was Made for Lovin' You" and "I Think I'm Losing You" released as singles, while "You're a Thief" and "Stuck On You" were unreleased at the time. The second side of the album features a cover of the 1944 song "Return to Sender" by The Mills Brothers (who had a very minor hit with it in 1944) and a take on The Bee Gees' hit "You Should Be Dancing" from the same year. Sweet was the first to record an entire album of cover songs, which were often collaborations with Moroder, and this was one of the first albums to feature his electronic-inspired keyboard sound. The version of "You Should Be Dancing" that appears on this album is a re-recorded version from the box set Ties That Bind, My Mother's First Recordings, which featured versions of several of the songs recorded by her at the time. Sweet took this album on the road with him for his following album Too Hefty To Fail and its various tour editions, and is noted for introducing a lot of songs on this album that he was never to play again. In addition to the two songs Sweet made available for download on his website, all tracks from this album are available for download from iTunes.
